(3) The Wedding Ceremony. The Sadi. The actual wedding is divided into three parts, each occurring on a different day and the whole lasting three days. There is first the arrival of the barat—the party which brings the bridegroom and which reaches the girl's village on the evening of the first day. The next part occurs on the following night and is the wedding proper, the sadi; and finally the bridegroom departs for his own home on the third day and this is called the bida or farewell. 585

(a) Barat. A day or two after the parching of the lawa there are preparations at the bridegroom's house for the departure from thence for the house of the bride. The barat is usually so planned that it arrives at the girl's village just after dusk. The barat is made up entirely of men, and women are not permitted to accompany the procession. Before the barat can leave there is a feast given to its members by the women of the family. Following this the bridegroom is put into a palki or litter. The party also takes with it various things needed for the sadi including the lawa, a barain (small whitish-coloured earthenware pot decorated with yellow figures and in which are carried a seer of rice and, if in season, two mangoes), seven dips (earthenware lamps), and a dahingar (a decorated earthen pot like the barain in which dahi—curds—are kept). These things are carried by the party in baskets on their heads, but in the palki will be put the sendur, kankan (black and red beads strung on a thin iron wire), some toya and gobar (cowdung). Some one to beat the drum should accompany the party which leaves the boy's village amid music and singing. The women who remain behind are busy preparing for the return of the bridegroom and his party three days later. [562] [574] [493] [482] 585 574

The procession should not arrive in the village until night has fallen. Upon its arrival it does not at once enter the village, but stops some distance away and with drums and singing announces its presence. The girl's party which has been waiting the arrival of the barat is now summoned by her father. The women of the bride's party accompany the men in greeting the barat and the group proceeds to the edge of the village with lights, the person carrying the leading light being either the girl's sister or a female cousin. This light is carried on top of an earthen jar resting on the head in a manner similar to the way the light is carried at the mangarmati time. The men of the party bring a chhattari, or an umbrella made of bamboo branches and leaves from the palasa tree. Like the crown in Europe, the umbrella in village India is essentially a symbol of sovereignty. A mashal, or torch on the end of a pole is also brought and waved about in imitation of a battle. The men of the two parties now meet and greet one [354] [482] [293] [354] another. In more Hinduized communities they may set off fireworks at this time if they can afford them. The arrangement for these is made by a Basor. In the midst of this din the girl's father speaks to the boy's father and tells him that they are glad that they have come, that they will expect them to tarry for some days in their village, and that everything possible will be done for their comfort. As the best wedding months are usually dry and pleasant, the boy's party may be accommodated under a large tree. Wherever they are put, the place is called the janmasa. If there is an available house so much the better.

On entering the village the two parties repair to the bride's house, led by the woman with the lamp on her head. Upon reaching the house the rice is taken out of the barain, pipes are passed around for a smoke, and even drinks may be offered. During this time the bridegroom has remained seated in his palki which is now brought close to the marriage booth. He reaches out and shakes the booth, to test, as it were, its strength and workmanship. The girl's mother comes to the palki and with the thumb and little finger of her right hand dabs a bit of vermilion on the forehead of her future son-in-law and then pours out the water which was in the kalsa with the light that brought them into the village. Members of each group should bring gular or semal twigs, as the case may be, which have been plastered with gobar and which have some tikas (dabs) of sendur on them. These are laid in the centre of the booth next to the magrohan. The ghara of lawa is taken by a member of the boy's group, who walks round the palki seven times with it. After the seventh round the boy's maur or wedding crown (made up usually, of peacock feathers, bamboo and palm leaves) is removed and the party retires to the place prepared for them, the janmasa.

Arriving at the janmasa they settle themselves and are again supplied with smokes by members of the bride's household. Pre-
